Don't return the result of float(s) or None on fail. if you then use it as `x = float('0.00')`; if `x: use float(x)`; you've now got a bug in your code. Truthy values are the reason these functions raise an exception rather than returning None in the first place. A better solution is just to avoid the utility function and surround the call to float in a try catch when you want to use it ...
